INTRODUCTION

The Boston Public Library organization includes two service divisions; the Research Library (non-circulating) and the General Library. The General Library is comprised of the General Library (Central), all of the Branch libraries, as well as Bookmobile and Homesmobile (service to shut-ins) services.

When the new major addition to the McKim building on Copley Square was opened on December 12, 1972, the General Library (Central) collections were moved into the new expanded quarters. The General Library collections are now located on the four public floors of this new building; Concourse, 1st floor, Mezzanine and 2nd floor.

The collections housed on the Mezzanine level represent the Foreign Language Collection. This collection contains about 60,000 volumes, and 44 languages are represented. All of these books are available for home borrowing.

The books in this collection are intended to meet the borrowing needs of the general public. The collection, therefore, contains a broad representation of literatures, ranging from the very popular fiction, "how-to-do-it" books, to translations of the world's classic literature.

This classified catalog of the collection is arranged alphabetically by language. Within language the entries are arranged by the Library of Congress classification number, the same number that appears on the spine of each book. In each language the children's material comes at the end. All of the children's books have a J prefix to the class number. The Arabic, Korean, and Japanese titles are not included in this catalog.
